Wearing traditional Chinese shoes, Diane Berthelot walked around her classroom to check and correct the students' pronunciation as they read English novels aloud in groups.

Students in each group of three or four were asked to take (46) _____ in reading a section of a popular book, be it Twilight, Jurassic Park or Danny Wallace's Hamish series, and the others would listen and point out the mistakes in their classmates' pronunciation.

This is a typical scene in Berthelot's class, an American who has been teaching English at the Hubei University of Technology in Wuhan, Central China's Hubei province, for over nine years.

Berthelot believes in keeping learning simple. By looking at the teaching methods being used and talking with local teachers from various grades, she created a unique teaching methodology that enables students to learn faster by creating a strong (47) _____ (found).

“Mrs. Berthelot has corrected the mistakes in my pronunciation and changed some of my ideas. I’m lucky to have a teacher like her who is (48) _____ (competence) and easygoing,” says Lin Ling, a freshman at the university.

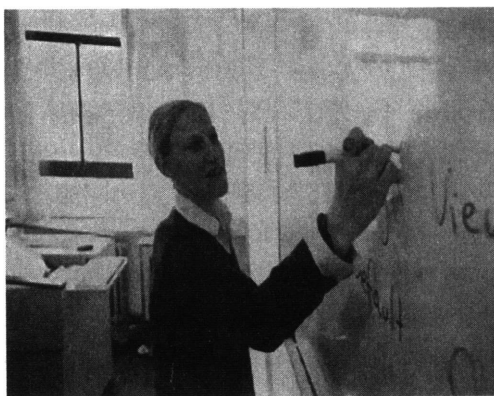

Back in her hometown in the United States, Berthelot used to work for a large insurance company and had always wanted to be a teacher and travel around the world.

She first showed her talent for teaching English when she helped her Chinese sister-in-law overcome her difficulties while learning the English language. The latter encouraged her to go to China to pursue her dream.

“Having the opportunity to come here and become a teacher is (49) _____ my dream come true,” says Berthelot.

During the COVID-19 epidemic that had hit Wuhan hard, Berthelot decided to stay and moved her classes online. She says she did not panic at all because the university took good (50) _____ of her.

“I think the way China handled it (COVID-19) was to be commended. Everything was done in such a way (51) _____ to make it the least difficult on the people,” she comments.

Over the years, she was most impressed by the rapid changes that have taken place in Wuhan and China as a whole. New buildings and streets have sprung up, and cities have turned greener.

“I have never seen a country grow as quickly as China has,” she says.

China will build itself into a country strong in culture, education, talent and sports by 2035, according to a communique (52) _____ (release) after the Fifth Plenary Session of the 19th Central Committee of the Communist Party of China in late October.

In Berthelot’s eyes, the country is already in the process of realizing that goal. The changes are being felt through the improvement of students.

“Just look at the students. Every (53) ge_____ is getting better and better,” says Berthelot.

Berthelot’s experience as a teacher has constantly brought her a strong sense of (54) ach_____. She still remembers when a student from her first year of teaching came back to visit her and told her that she had changed his life.

“That made me feel so good,” she says, smiling.

After this term, Berthelot will go back and (55) reu_____ with her family in the US state of Florida.

She will bring back various traditional Chinese ornaments that she has always been fond of and tell her grandchildren stories about China and the Chinese people she met who have become her friends and family.

Part IV Reading Comprehension (30 marks)

There are three passages in this part. Each passage is followed by several questions. Respond to the questions using information from the passage. Remember to write the answers on the answer sheet.

Section A (10 marks)

Questions 56—60 are based on the following passage.

Margaret Gould Stewart has designed for some of the giants of the Internet, including Google, YouTube, and Facebook. Here are two lessons she has learned from her experience designing for Internet users.

LOOK BEYOND DATA

(56) _____ But of the cases reported, only a small percentage of the photos were actually offensive. One of the designers on the team felt there probably was a reason for this, so he studied the cases carefully. He found that in most cases users just didn't like the photos of themselves their friends had posted, and wanted them taken down. To enable people to report cases like these, the Facebook team added a new feature. This feature allowed people to message their friends to ask them to take the photo down. But only 20 percent of people used the function.

(57) _____ It discovered that users didn't just want to tell their friends to take the photo down—they wanted to tell their friends how the photo made them feel. So the team made a small change. People could select a message to explain why they didn't like it, such as, "It's embarrassing." This small change had a huge impact—60 percent of people who reported photos used the function. Surveys showed that people on both sides of the conversation felt better as a result.

While data about how people are using a product can help designers make decisions, it isn't always as simple as following the numbers. (58) _____ As Stewart points out, "Data can help you make a good design great, but it will never make a bad design good."

INTRODUCE CHANGE CAREFULLY

(59) _____ When Stewart and her team looked into the data, they found that most were only using either the highest rating (five stars) or the lowest rating (one star). Almost no one was using two, three, or four stars. So the team decided to simplify the rating—it gave users a choice between good or bad: thumbs up or thumbs down.

YouTube tried to prepare people for this change by sharing data about how the five-star rating system wasn't being used as intended. (60) _____ When the change was made, it was still frustrating for some users as they had become attached to the old design. However, because of the preparatory steps taken earlier, it was easier for YouTube to get users to accept the change.

This experience shows that even when huge websites try to manage change carefully, it's impossible to completely avoid negative responses. Any changes—even small improvements—need to be introduced carefully.

Questions 56—60

Choose from the sentences A ~ G the one which best fits each gap of 56—60. There are two extra sentences which you do not need to use.

- A. Other factors such as intuition, research, and testing of design are equally important.

 - C. It announced that it was going to change the system to match user behaviour.
 - D. For a long time, Facebook had a tool that allowed people to report photos as spam or abuse.
 - E. Data is important in helping designers make decisions, but it must be looked at carefully.
 - F. The team worked on the cases further—it spoke to communications experts and studied rules of polite language.
 - G. At one time, YouTube was looking for ways to encourage more people to rate videos.

Section B (10 marks)

Questions 61—65 are based on the following passage.

In order to protect public and private property from being destroyed by lava flows, various plans and actual attempts have been made in the past on volcanoes to stop or divert lava flows, including Mount Etna, Sicily, Italy; Kilauea and Mauna Loa volcanoes, Hawaii, and Eldfell volcano, Heimaey, Vestmannaeyjar, Iceland. The lava-cooling operations on Heimaey, Iceland, were, however, the most extensive ever attempted, and the two excellent accounts of the operations that were published in Icelandic by a geophysicist and two engineers are translated into English in this open-file report. BirgirJónsson also published a report on the use of dikes to divert lava flows; he mentioned past attempts in Italy, Japan, Iceland, Samoa, and Hawaii, but devoted most of his paper to presenting a case study of the 1973 eruption on Heimaey.

The village of Vestmannaeyjar, in the far northern country of Iceland, is as bright and clean and up-to-date as any American or Canadian suburb. It is located on the island of Heimaey, just off the mainland. One January night in 1973, however, householders were shocked from their sleep. In some backyard red-hot liquid was spurting from the ground. Flaming skyrocketed shot up and over the houses. The island's volcano, Helgafell, silent for seven thousand years, was violently erupting!

Luckily, the island's fishing fleet was in port, and within twenty-four hours almost everyone was ferried to the mainland. But then the agony of the island began in earnest. As in a nightmare, fountains of burning lava spurted three hundred feet high. Black, baseball-size cinders rained down. An evil-smelling, eye-burning, throat-searing cloud of smoke and gas erupted into the air, and a river of lava flowed down the mountain. The constant shriek of escaping steam was punctuated by ear-splitting explosions.

As time went on, the once pleasant village of Vestmannaeyjar took on a weird aspect. Its street lamps still burning against the long Arctic night, the town lay under a thick blanket of cinders. All that could be seen above the ten-foot black drifts were the tips of street signs. Some houses had collapsed under the weight of cinders; others had burst into flames as the heat ignited their oil storage tanks. Lighting the whole lurid scene, fire continued to shoot from the mouth of the looming volcano.

The eruption continued for six months. Scientists and reporters arrived from around the world to observe the awesome natural event. But the town did not die that easily. In July, when the eruption ceased, the people of Heimaey Island returned to assess the chances of rebuilding their homes and lives. They found tons of ash covering the ground. The Icelanders are a tough people, however, accustomed to the strange and violent nature of their Arctic land. They dug out their homes. They even used the cinders to build new roads and airport runways. Now the new homes of Heimaey are warmed from water pipes heated by molten lava.

Because of the success of the Icelanders in their massive lava-cooling operations during the 1973 eruption of Eldfell volcano within the town of Vestmannaeyjar, on the island of Heimaey, in the Vestmannaeyjar archipelago, Iceland, a scientist decided that English translations of two relevant reports by Icelandic scientists and engineers on the lava-cooling operations would be useful to volcanically active regions, where access to water (river, lake, or ocean) could provide the basis for lava-cooling operations.

Questions 61 to 65

Answer the following questions with the information given in the passage.

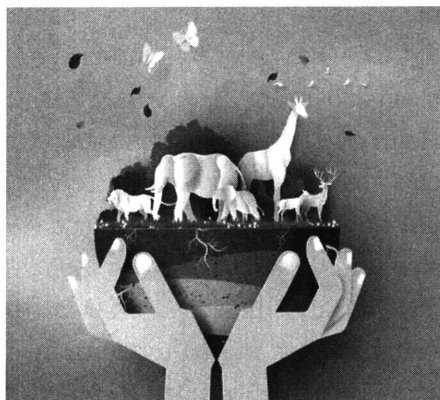

61. Where is the village located?
62. How long had the island's volcano been inactive?
63. Where did the local residents go during the eruption?
64. Why did the scientists and reporters go to the village?
65. What did the local residents do after the eruption?

Section C (10 marks)

Questions 66—70 are based on the following passage.

Not many people know this, but Norway was invaded by aliens in 1960. The aliens don't live on the land, but in the sea, and today there are thought to be more than 20 million of them. They have spread across the Barents Sea, travelling in groups of 10,000 or more, and eating everything. These aliens aren't from outer space. They are a kind of crab called the red king crab, and they usually live in the north Pacific Ocean.

How did crabs that are native to the North Pacific Ocean find their way to Europe? The answer is simple—humans took them there. The red king crab is very big and delicious. In 1960, the Russian government wanted to increase the number of crabs they could catch, so they took some to the Russian Barents Sea. The crabs multiplied rapidly, spreading through the Barents Sea from the Russian part to the Norwegian part. As well as eating everything from baby fish to other crabs, they also cut holes in fishing nets.

Ironically, in an age of overfishing, the only way to solve the problem of the red king crab in Europe is to catch and eat them all.

It is not the kind of alien invasion that we find in Hollywood movies and science fiction novels, but alien species are causing a huge problem around the world, and too few people are aware of it. An alien species is simply a type of plant, animal, or insect that has been brought from a place where it is native to a place where it is not. Such species are usually referred to as “introduced species,” and examples in Japan include tomato, potato, apple, peach, tobacco, corn, the mulberry tree, the tea plant, and the silkworm. The majority of these introduced species fit into the local environment without causing any problems, often because they find it difficult to spread in the wild, and tend to stay on farms. Some of these species however, find it easy to spread in the wild, and start causing problems, often by causing local species to go extinct or by damaging the health of animals and humans.

The disruption caused by invasive species can be enormous: it is estimated that the cost of dealing with invasive species and money lost from damaged land is about $135 billion per year in the United States alone. Let’s look at one example to understand how they can cause so much damage.

In 1788, Thomas Austin, an Englishman who liked hunting, released 24 rabbits into the Australian wild. By 1950, there were more than 600 million rabbits in Australia. Furthermore, they had helped to cause the extinction of one in every eight mammal species in Australia by competing with them for food. They had also destroyed an unknown number of plant species, and they were the cause of a lot of soil erosion in Australia because they ate all the plants. The government tried to kill the rabbits by infecting them with the myxomatosis virus, which killed 80 percent of the rabbits. Today, there are still between 200 and 300 million rabbits in Australia, but now they are resistant to the virus.

Once introduced, invasive species are hard to get rid of. Sometimes we can introduce something that eats them, but that doesn’t always work because these species can become invasive themselves. Clearly the best way is to avoid releasing new species into the wild, and working hard to get rid of the ones that are already there. In 2004, a survey for the Convention on Biological Diversity found 2,248 invasive species in Japan. The Japanese government passed the Invasive Alien Species Act in 2004 to help deal with the problem. Now there are many volunteer groups that are trying to eradicate invasive species in Japan. Why don’t you help them save Japan from the alien invaders?

Complete the summary below with information from the passage, using one or two words for each blank.

We are living in a time when many species of animals and plants are in danger of becoming (66) _____. However, not many people are (67) _____ the fact that, in order to save them, we sometimes have to (68) _____ other kinds of plants and animals. This is because some of the plants and animals that we are used to seeing every day are destroying the species that are (69) _____ our country. Solving this problem is very difficult, expensive and will take a long time, but if we don't start dealing with the problem of (70) _____ species now, many of our native plants and animals will disappear forever.

Part V Translation (15 marks)

Section A (5 marks)

Translate the following paragraph into Chinese. Remember to write the answers on the answer sheet.

71. The march of technology may seem unstoppable, but all digital things may have a long way to go before they replace the traditional bedtime book—the paper one. A new study shows that paper books are better than e-books for bedtime reading. The study suggests that the good old printed book, with real pages that you turn with your fingers, makes parents and children interact more than they do when reading with an electronic book. Researchers from the University of Michigan studied how 37 pairs of parents and toddlers interacted with e-books and paper books. The researchers found that with electronic books, parents asked their children fewer questions and made fewer comments about the story.
