Part IV Reading Comprehension (35 marks)

Read the following passages. Each passage is followed by several questions. Respond to the questions using information from the passage. Remember to write the answers on the answer sheet.

Section A (5 marks)

Questions 56-60 are based on the following passage.

How Do You Know When Someone Is Lying?

How the ancient Chinese did it

The Chinese used rice. An examination for truthfulness might go something like this: "Is your name Chiang?" (They knew the guy's name was, in fact, Chiang.)

"Yes."

The interrogators handed Mr. Chiang some rice. They had already counted the number of rice grains.

"OK. Put this handful of rice in your mouth. Hold it for three seconds. Spit it out."

Then they counted how many rice grains came out.

"Did you steal the chicken?"

"No."

"OK. Put this handful of rice in your mouth again. Hold it for three seconds. Spit it out."

Again, they knew how many grains went in, and they counted how many came out. If more grains came out after the question about the stolen chicken than those that came out after the "easy" question, where the suspect truthfully gave his name, they knew he was lying. How? The stress of being caught lying made the suspect's mouth drier. Fewer grains stuck, more came out. Mr. Chiang stole the chicken.

Modern lie detectors

Modern lie detectors—also known as "polygraphs"—rely on the same basic principle—that lying causes bodily changes, which can be detected and measured. Having agreed to do the test (if the test is done under duress, the extra stress caused makes the test unreliable), the suspect is connected to three devices measuring blood pressure, breathing rate and electrodermal response (the increased amount of electricity which flows to the skin when we sweat). Increased activity in these areas suggests increased stress... which means the subject might be lying.

Lie detectors have been widely used in the US since the 1950s but they remain controversial and their results are not always accepted by courts.

The results of a test taken by the British nanny Louise Woodward to support her plea of not guilty of killing a child in her care were not admitted as evidence at her trial in Massachusetts. Nowadays, poly graphs are used by the US police, the CIA and the FBI to screen job applicants, but private employers are not allowed to subject job candidates to polygraph examinations, except in a few high-security industries like pharmaceuticals and money manufacturing.

Your voice

Cheaper and faster than a polygraph, the voice stress analyzer, or VSA is based on the premise that our voice changes when we are under stress—when we're lying for example. The VSA detects the changes, and will work on a telephone, tape recording or from the next room via a wireless mic or bug. The analyzer monitors the subject's voice patterns and inflections, and electronically evaluates their relative stress patterns to determine if they are lying or not. Now you can even buy a "Truth Phone", so when your other half rings to say they're working late at the office, you can immediately know if it's true or not! Research indicates this technology is not very precise at picking up deceitfulness.

Hesitation

The period of time between the last word of an investigator's question and the first word of the subject's response is known as "Response latency". Research tells us that the average response latency for subjects who are telling the truth is 0.5 seconds whereas the average latency for liars is 1.5 seconds. This is because the subject is mentally considering whether to tell the truth, part of the truth, or a complete lie. Latencies of two or three seconds should be regarded as highly suspicious. In other words, he who hesitates is probably lying!

Blushing

According to researchers in the USA, when someone lies they get an instantaneous warming around the eyes...commonly known as "blushing". Dr. James Levine of the Mayo Clinic in Rochester, Minnesota, speculates that people who lie are afraid of getting caught. "That fear triggers a primitive response to run away. Blood goes to the eyes so that the liar can more efficiently map out an escape route," he says. A high-definition, heat-sensing camera can detect such blushes; the new technology has proved more reliable than conventional lie detectors and could offer a new tool for mass security screening at places like airports, office buildings and high-profile events.

Questions 56-60: Mark each statement as either true(T) or false(F) according to the passage.

- 56. Lying made it easier to spit out the grains of rice.
- 57. Modern lie detectors are reliable in the vast majority of cases.
- 58. The main advantages of the VS A are its cheapness and reliability.
- 59. The less hesitation someone shows, the less likely it is they are lying.
- 60. High-definition, heat-sensing cameras are more widely used nowadays.

Section B (10 marks)

Questions 61-65 are based on the following passage.

Why No One Walks?

I'll tell you this, but you have to promise that it will get no further. Not long after we moved here we had the people next door round for dinner and—I swear this is true—they drove.

(61)_____ Nobody walks anywhere in America nowadays.

A researcher at the University of California at Berkeley recently made a study of the nation's walking habits and concluded that 85 percent of people in the United States are "essentially" sedentary and 35 percent are "totally" sedentary. The average American walks less than 75 miles a year—about 1.4 miles a week, barely 350 yards a day. I'm no stranger to sloth myself, but that's appallingly little. I rack up more mileage than that just looking for the channel changer.

One of the things we wanted when we moved to America was to live in a town within walking distance of shops. Hanover, where we settled, is a small, typical New England college town, pleasant, sedate and compact. It has a broad green, an old-fashioned Main Street, nice college buildings with big lawns, and leafy residential streets. It is, in short, an agreeable, easy place to stroll. (62)_____

I walk to town nearly every day when I am at home. I go to the post office or library or the local bookshop, and sometimes, if I am feeling particularly debonair, I stop at Rosey Jekes Café for a cappuccino. Every few weeks or so I call in at the barbershop and let one of the guys there do something rash and lively with my hair. All this is a big part of my life and I wouldn't dream of doing it other than on foot. People have got used to this curious and eccentric behaviour now, but several times in the early days passing neighbours would slow by the kerb and ask if I wanted a lift.

(63) _____

"Honestly, I enjoy walking."

(64) _____

People have become so habituated to using the car for everything that it would never occur to them to unfurl their legs and see what they can do. Sometimes it's almost ludicrous. The other day I was in a little nearby town called Etna waiting to bring home one of my children from a piano lesson when a car stopped outside the local post office and a man about my age popped out and dashed inside (and left the motor running). He was inside for about three to four minutes, then came out, got in the car and drove exactly 16 feet I had nothing better to do so I paced it off to the general store next door, and popped in again, engine still running.

And the thing is this man looked really fit. I am sure he jogs extravagant distances and plays squash and does all kinds of exuberantly healthful things, but I am just as sure that he drives to each of these undertakings. It's crazy. An acquaintance of ours was complaining the other day about the difficulty of finding a place to park outside the local gymnasium. She goes there several times a week to walk on a treadmill. The gymnasium is, at most, a six-minute walk from her front door. I asked her why she didn't walk to the gym and do six minutes less on the treadmill.

She looked at me as if I were tragically simple-minded and said, "But I have a programme for the treadmill. It records my distance and speed, and I can adjust it for degree of difficulty." (65) _____ .

Questions 61-65: Complete the article with the following sentences. There are two extra sentences that you do not need.

- A. "But I'm going your way," they would insist when I politely declined. "Really, it's no bother."
- B. I was astounded, but I have since come to realize that there was nothing especially odd in their driving less than a couple of hundred feet to visit us.
- C. But they always looked so upset when I said this, that I gave in and accepted the lift. I didn't have the heart to make them feel they were leaving me to my fate.
- D. Nearly everyone in town is within a level five-minute walk of the shops, and yet as far as I can tell virtually no one does.
- E. It had not occurred to me how thoughtlessly deficient nature is in this regard.
- F. The fact is, Americans not only don't walk anywhere, they won't walk anywhere, and woe to anyone who tries to make them walk.

G."Well, if you' re absolutely sure,"they would say and depart reluctantly, even guiltily, as if they felt they were leaving the scene of an accident.

Section D (10 marks)

Questions 71-75 are based on the following passage.

The English language, like all languages, has evolved over time. Old English (OE), developed from the Germanic branch of Indo-European languages and was characterized by limited vocabulary with word endings that identified the gender, number and case of words. Middle English (ME) was distinguished by a large influx of French words into the language, and the shift to more simplified word forms. Modern English featured a move toward standardization of the language by formalizing both usage and spelling.

Some 17th and 18th century writers held a rather low opinion of English. They felt that because French and Latin followed specific patterns and rules, these languages were more prestigious than English. Such writers as Jonathan Swift and John Dryden concluded that the corruption they saw in their native tongue could be improved by standardization of the language. A number of these writers advanced the idea of a language academy, modeled after the Italian and French academies, as a move toward standardization. The Italian and French academies had both set about creating dictionaries of their respective languages, so it was proposed that the English academy should create a standardized grammar and dictionary for the English language. An English academy was never actually established, but various writers did succeed in establishing a process of standardization by the end of the 1700s.

The first writer to publish a book of grammar rules for "proper" use of English was William Loughton, in 1734. This was followed by Joseph Priestley's attempt at establishing grammar rules in his Rudiments of English Grammar. Priestley's grammar was not nearly as famous as his later scientific work and his discovery of oxygen. Other grammar texts followed later. All of these works based grammar rules on the writers' opinions of correct usage of the language rather than on an analysis of how people really used the language.

The move toward regulation proposed by Dryden and others was to prescribe correct usage of the English language. A few of the rules proposed in the prescriptive grammar texts of Dryden's time were changes in the use of double negatives, contractions, and spellings. Such rules are known today as prescriptive grammar. Later, another way of looking at the roles of English grammar developed. Writers of this second kind of grammar texts objectively described the rules native speakers seemed to follow. This kind of grammar was later referred to as descriptive.

The debate between the prescriptivists and the descriptivists has continued until the present day. For example, according to prescriptive grammar rules set up by Dryden and his colleagues, English sentences should never end with a preposition. In common usage, however, prepositions show up quite regularly at the end of sentences. Prescriptivists also view the usage of "ain't" as a contraction of "am not" as inelegant and wrong, whereas many dictionaries list "ain't", indicating the word is used by speakers of English.

The prescriptivists also disallow regional usage that does not follow the standard rules of English. Such regional variations in American English include the use of "y' all" by speakers in the South to mean "you all". Contraction of the same words can be heard as "youse" in the Northeast, especially used by working-class speakers of English.

What then is right and wrong in language, and who decides? It can be argued that the final decision about correct or incorrect language rests with those who hold power in society. Language as cultural capital can be used to allow access to institutions or classes in society while excluding those who do not use the accepted form of the language. Most linguists would argue that the language of educated middle-class speakers is not better (or worse) than the language of other social groups. They would, however, acknowledge that some standardization of form is useful.

Is corruption of the English language a problem, then, as some prescriptivists claim? The descriptivists' answer is that English is changing, as all languages must, but that such change is not a corruption of the language. Living language must change, adapt, and grow. Whether change is good or bad is not the question, descriptivists say, because change is inevitable. The only languages no longer in flux are those no longer in use.

Questions 71-75:

Complete the summary below with information from the passage, using no more than three words for each blank.

The English language first developed from the Germanic branch of the Indo-European languages. One of the major changes in the language from Old English to Middle English was the (71) _____ of French words into the language. During the shift from Middle to Modern English, (72) _____ were introduced for standardization. Writers who supported this (73) _____ of the language held the opinion that, compared to Latin and French, English was inelegant due to its lack of rules. These writers set down (74) _____ of grammar and spelling for others to follow. However, some modern linguists argue that grammars should describe the (75) _____ of the language rather than force rules upon native speakers of the language. The debate between prescriptive and descriptive grammar continues today.

Although it was my first attempt at living on my own,I had a sense of adventure and I choose a place far from familiarity of home. My advice is first to look for university accommodation as it is usually more afford. If this is not possible read the notice boards in the university campus, you will find a considerable number of message offering a wide variety of share accommodation. If you value your privacy, you could look for a bedsit. As you can imagine, bedsits on university towns do not come cheap and there are many agencies that you can turn to if you are interested in this option. Finally one thing that you could consider is to find lodgings outside town, which accommodation is cheaper. If you want a peaceful neighborhood, this could be the choice for you.
